Reframing Multiculturalism: Women's Community-based Pluralism in the International Institute Movement, 1940s-1970s

Franca Iacovetta's talk draws on the book she is writing on the history of women's "bottom-up" pluralism in Canada. It focuses on the activities of women involved in the international institute movement – a North American movement whose origins date to 1910 – in Toronto.

The talk will assess the ideals and practices of the mix of Anglo-Canadian, ethno-Canadian, and immigrant women involved and the double-edged nature of their pluralism. As pluralists, they viewed immigrants as bearers of cultural gifts, such as folk customs and enriching talents, and their big colourful events drew culturally diverse audiences. They advocated pluralist social-work methods that professed respect for non-dominant cultural custom, but as integrationists, also demanded conformity to a common core of Canadian values and norms. To facilitate immigrant adjustment to Canadian society, they offered a range of services, such as individualized counselling for personal and family problems. At times, Institute staff acted like progressive pluralists, other times, as intrusive experts. Results of their activities were both positive (community-building) and negative (Eurocentricism). These doubled-edged features would also influence late-twentieth-century official multiculturalism in Canada.
