Nicholas Keung writes about immigration, refugee and diversity issues. He has been honoured with the Online Journalism Awards and his work has been recognized by Urban Alliance on Race Relations and the Canadian Association of Refugee Lawyers.

“What Information do Journalists want from Immigration Researchers?”

In this session, we will have Nicholas Keung, immigration reporter for the Toronto Star, discuss his job, his interactions with academia, and what he thinks academics should do to make their research more interesting to a broader audience. Below is a list of some of the questions that he will address:

1. How did you get your job at the Toronto Star? When did you know that you wanted to be a journalist?
2. What advice would you give to young people interested in migration and ethnic relations today?
3. How often do you interact with academics?
4. How do you use academic research in your writing?
5. What are some of the things you like/don't like about interacting with academics?
6. What advice would you give to academics overall about the way they write and think about immigration?
7. What types of stories get the most traction?
8. What aspects of your training make you good at your job?
9. What do you think will be the hot topics of immigration in the future?
